

“In another case, in the carved stone palettes used to grind pigments it is noted the influence of the Hohokam culture..... a great quantity of these have been found within the construction zone of the Infiernillo Dam, where the Hohokam had reached in their journeys to the south following the coast....

Guerrero, State Monograph published by Secretary of Public Education of Mexico, p. 67

The state of Guerrero lies some 1,500 miles to the south of Arizona yet the above reference from a text used within the public school systems of Mexico reminds us of the extent of the cultural and economic relationships of the Huhukam Peoples and their descendants of today. In fact, these networks of culture and trade existed throughout the continent, and over the past generation we have seen the resurgence of these ancestral alliances across the territories of the Nations of the Indigenous Peoples.

On Saturday, July 30 at 10:00 AM at the NAHUACALLI yet another page of this history will unfold when a community reception and dialogue will take place with our relatives from TAWANTINSUYO, representatives of the Confederation of the Condor, Abya Yala. Two representatives of the Confederation of Indigenous Nationalities of Ecuador (CONAIE) who are traveling through the territory on a diplomatic mission to meet and dialogue with the Indigenous Peoples of North America will be guests of honor. They are on their way to the Bear Butte Summit of Indigenous Nations in South Dakota to exchange messages of mutual commitment and solidarity with the Confederation of the Eagle of the North. Issues of local, regional, continental and global import will be discussed, including the campaigns of the Indigenous Peoples of the southern continent in opposition to the globalization strategies such as Free Trade of the Americas being promoted by the current administration in Washington.

This event is fulfillment of traditional obligations and protocols of the Treaty of Teotihuacan, proclaimed at the First International Summit of Indigenous Nations and Pueblos held at Teotihuacan, Mexico in the year 2000.
